PREFACE.

This Part begins with the representation of a fragment, at present unique of its kind. It is a panel of ebony which formed part of a shrine, and which lay buried in the débris on the roof of the Northern Speos. It is described with that portion of the building where it was found.

All the other Plates illustrate the Northern Half of the Middle Platform, which is on a lower level than the Altar-court described in Part I.

These Plates, like those of Part I., are all new. None of the representations here published is to be found in any of the previous works on the Temple by Duemichen or Mariette; for, except the top of the Shrine of Anubis, all that side of the building was buried deep in rubbish before our excavations began.

The sculptures and inscriptions are of various kinds. In the Anubis Shrine they are merely religious. In the Middle Colonnade they refer to the queen herself. The back wall of the Colonnade, in its whole length north and south of the Causeway, was devoted to the biography of Hatshepsu; the scenes begin with her miraculous birth, and go on with her education.

In this volume we give only that portion of the legend which refers to her divine origin and to her early childhood. Her coronation by her father, as well as the most important event of her reign, her expedition to the land of Punt, will form the subject of the next number.

As in Part I., Mr. John Newberry kindly undertook to draw the plans and write the architectural descriptions. The artistic part of the work, in which the same skill will be recognized which earned the admiration of the readers of the previous number, is due to Mr. Howard Carter and Mr. Percy Brown.
